How to Create Your Own “How Well Do You Know Me Questions” Game

Step 1: Know Your Audience

Before writing questions, consider who will be answering. A coworker, a new friend, and a lifelong spouse will all have different levels of familiarity. Adjust the difficulty and depth accordingly. For example, a colleague might only know your professional side, so keep questions work-appropriate yet personal enough to be interesting.

Step 2: Mix Easy and Hard Questions

A good quiz balances obvious facts (your favorite color) with obscure ones (the song you sang in your fifth-grade talent show). This keeps the game engaging — if every question is too easy, it’s boring; if every question is impossible, it becomes frustrating. Aim for a 50-50 split between surface-level and deep questions.

Step 3: Use Open-Ended or Multiple Choice?

For in-person games, multiple choice works well because it gives the responder a chance to guess. For written or social media versions, open-ended questions let the respondent show off their memory. Consider the format: Instagram stories often use polls, while a party might be more fun with verbal answers.

Step 4: Add a Scoring System

To increase excitement, assign points for correct answers. You can also include bonus points for correct explanations or funny stories. A simple scoring system: 1 point for each correct answer, 2 points if they also explain why they think that way. This encourages deeper thinking.

How to Use “How Well Do You Know Me Questions” in Different Settings

Social Media and Online Platforms

Instagram, TikTok, and Facebook have made this format viral. Users post a list of 5 to 10 questions in their story with the prompt: “Answer these and I’ll rate how well you know me.” It’s a low-effort way to engage followers and start conversations. Many people also create quizzes using apps like Quizizz or Kahoot for virtual game nights.

Party Games and Icebreakers

At a gathering, you can turn these questions into a team game. Each person writes their own set of “how well do you know me questions” on slips of paper. Everyone draws a random person’s questions and tries to answer. The person who wrote them judges the responses. This works especially well for groups where not everyone knows each other equally well.

Date Nights and Relationship Check-Ins

Couples often use these questions as a playful way to assess their connection. You can make it a regular activity, like a “monthly quiz” where you each write five new questions. Over time, you’ll notice how your answers evolve as you grow together.

Team Building at Work

Modified to be professional yet personal, these questions can help coworkers bond. Avoid overly intimate topics. Instead, focus on preferences, fun facts, and work-related insights. For example: “What is my favorite productivity hack?” or “Which project was I most proud of last year?”

Common Mistakes to Avoid When Playing the Game

Asking Questions That Are Too Generic

If you ask "What is my favorite food?" it's fine, but it's better to be specific: "What is my favorite dish from that Thai restaurant we went to last summer?" Generic questions don't test genuine intimate knowledge; they test common assumptions.

Using Only Yes/No Questions

Yes/no questions limit the fun. Instead, frame them as open-ended or multiple choice to allow for reasoning. For example, instead of "Do I like horror movies?" ask "What is my favorite horror movie, and why does it scare me?"

Ignoring the Responder's Feelings

The game should always be lighthearted. Avoid questions that could embarrass or hurt someone. For example, don't ask "What is my biggest physical insecurity?" unless you have a very comfortable relationship and consent. Keep it respectful.

Not Keeping Score or Following Up

Part of the charm is comparing scores and laughing at wrong answers. If you don't reveal answers or discuss them, the game loses its bonding potential. Always take a moment to share the correct answer and the story behind it.

Adapting the Game for Digital vs. In-Person

In a digital environment, you might record a video asking the questions or use a shared document. In person, body language and tone add richness. For virtual game nights, consider using breakout rooms where everyone answers one person's set of "how well do you know me questions" while that person watches. Then switch. This works beautifully over Zoom or Discord.

Another digital twist: create a private Instagram or TikTok account with a series of question stories that only close friends can view. Each story can be a new question, and you can reply with your guess. The owner then posts the correct answer the next day. This turns the game into a slow-burn social event over a week.
